Chicago people are new talking about building an artificial river bed 200 feet wide by means of which a current of water from Lake Michigan can be employed to swell the banks of the Mississipps and promote the commercial and shipping facilities of the great metropolis of the lakes and also the convenience of the people along the line of the great soutgern water-course. This, it is said, can be done without diminishing the eastern flow of Michigan through Lake Haron. But Chicago has not said anything yet about subscribing the $25,000,000 required to cut this great ship canal. Manchester, England, is already at work cutting a canal of the same sort from itself to Liverpool, at an immense outlay, and she will make money by it.
